Brief Reviews of Important and Interesting New Publications.

If we remember rightly it is Mr. Le Gallienne who has told us that we were never safe from romance, but that she lurks continually in unexpected places. And now comes Mr. Charles Belmont Davis with a series of short and simple stories issued under the title, "The Borderland of Society" (Stones), to prove that the truism is actually true. Those careless, casual persons who think of romance as necessarily associated with point lace and diamonds, waving plumes and etching swords, and all that kind of thing, might never have known of the possibilities of pathos and elvish and simple heroism that lurk in the unassuming atmosphere of the dime museum, and might never have dreamt of the things of which a freak is capable, had it not been for the disinterested efforts of Mr. Davis. In one of these ingenious tales, "The Freak's Midsummer Night's Dream," this author tells the story of a royal living skeleton, a gay and innocent young female snake charmer and an utterly contemptible strong man. Young Hobart Peckham was the living skeleton, and, though he measured but about eighteen inches round the chest, he had a great, big heart. Whatever surgeons and scientific persons may have said as to the merely physiological situation of that necessary organ his conduct proved that, metaphorically, at least, his great big heart was in the right place. He loved young Maoli, the fair but fickle female snake charmer, and loved her so devotedly that on one occasion, when looking at her, he became peculiarly conscious, and a light pink flush gradually rose up from under his collar and diffused itself over his tightly drawn yellow face. It is but fair to say that this light pink flush was partly due to Hobart Peckham's disapproval of certain risqué remarks let fall by the lovely, who had neither arms nor legs, but who earned $25 a week by putting out little wooden anchors with a penknife. At first the living skeleton's love was unrequited, and, fascinated by the figure of the strong man and woman-like, ignoring the obvious fact that the iron balls he juggled with were hollow and not as heavy as the gentle public thought them, the fickle snake charmer cast the eye of affection upon this sorry hero and left young Hobart Peckham to the tender mercies of the legless man. This philosopher's reflections on the marital misadventures of another living skeleton were of a kind calculated to drive any tender-hearted freak to drink. He told young Hobart gruesome tales, such as that of Billy Batcliffe, who was the best skeleton in the business, but who was most abominably treated by the woman in whom he put his trust. And all the while the snake charmer flitted with the strong man before young Hobart's very eyes. But here, for a moment, we must let Mr. Charles Belmont Davis loose, to tell his harrowing tale through the medium of the legless man. "Poor Billy," said that saturnine philosopher, "he was a great favorite with the ladies, but he never cared for but the one that killed him. He died of a broken heart. She was a fine blonde, too. He met her from the platform and married her a week later at her home in Harlem. They were very happy for a time, and then she took up with a ticket chopper on the elevated road and Batcliffe pined away and died. She certainly did treat him rough. You see, Billy couldn't walk by himself, as his legs weren't big enough to carry him; so when the ticket chopper had finished his work he would come under the wing and whistle, and the blond woman would lift Billy out of his chair and lay him on his back on the floor while she went out. Billy used to lie there on his back, for all the world like a turtle, and kick and hollow for help, but the neighbors got used to it, and never gave him no heed." Small wonder that poor Billy broke his heart. And what will be the feelings of any tender-hearted reader when he learns that the bad blond woman and the wicked ticket chopper mortgaged poor Billy's bones to a hospital for $1,500, and ran away and spent the money in riotous living? Small wonder, too, that at such a tale as this that light pink flush rose gradually up from under young Hobart's collar. Or that, thinking possibly of what might some day happen to himself, the skeleton felt his great heart grow some within him, and "looked on the big frame of the strong man and cursed the God who had made him what he was."

Meanwhile Maoli, in a low-necked and short-sleeved blue silk dress, with black satin trimmings, was dipping her snakes in a tub of lukewarm water. Suddenly a woman's shriek rings through the vast halls of the dime museum, and—almost ere the reader knows just what has happened—behold young Hobart Peckham down on his knees, sucking the poison from a wound in the fair girl's finger; while she, also, still looks lovingly at the strong man. That sorry hero, we need scarcely state, sits heavily in his chair and doesn't do a thing but look frightened.

"My God, girl," he said at length, "tell me how bad it is!"

"You get a back," said the girl. And so the strong man rushed out into the crowded street, knocking over a small boy and using some highly unbecoming language. Young Hobart Peckham, on the other hand, preserved an admirable self-control, and took the girl to see the nearest doctor and even in the rush and bustle of this strenuous tale, Mr. Charles Belmont Davis finds time to tell us that the physician wore a black frock coat and a white lawn tie and was visibly suffering from the effects of the extreme heat incidental to a New York summer day.

At this point the narrator seems to grow somewhat feverish and confused, though the reader is left with the impression that poor Maoli is in a bad way. "What she needs," says the strong man, "is some fresh country air." And so young Hobart tiptoed gently to the sick girl's side and laid his thin hand lightly on her hair. "I'll all come right, little girl," he whispered. "I'll all come right." And then he, too, went out and sold his bones to the nearest hospital. But Maoli, having got the money, went off with the strong man, and Hobart Peckham, clad insufficiently in a suit of red worsted tight, set out through the crowded streets to follow them.

Not a breath stirred, the hot air from the river flooded up the narrow streets and was wafted slowly and miserably into the open windows of the high-built houses. An occasional man trudged wearily over the baked pavements.

Heading neither the hot air nor the high-built houses, nor the baked pavements, nor even the occasional man, the skeleton sped on. The elevated trains rushed quickly by, and they rushed by overhead, in their customary and unemotional way; all the noises of the street kept right on making themselves heard, and still the skeleton sped on. At last he reached the river, and for a moment thought of suicide. But honesty forbade. "I've no right to," he murmured. "I've no right to. It wouldn't be fair to the hospital."

At just about this point the skeleton and Mr. Davis both wake up, and the reader learns that it has all been a dream. Young Hobart is lying in the doctor's room, and over him stand Maoli and the physician with the white tie.

A few minutes later Maoli and the skeleton were driving back in their hired carriage.

"So I didn't sell my bones, and you didn't leave me, after all, did you?" said the skeleton.

"Leave you?" said Maoli. "I guess not. We're in it—both of us."

And although the sun was shining and the carriage was quite open, she held his hand in the one which had not been stung for at least a minute.

Happy, happy Maoli and happier skeleton, to have their loves thus eloquently told of by a

NEW BOOKS.

The Principles of Biology.

By HERBERT SPENCER. Vol. I. New Edition. Revised and Enlarged. Entirely Recast. 12mo, cloth, $2.00.

The rapid progress in biology during the last generation has necessitated a revision of this work. The principal changes which Mr. Spencer has made are as follows: New chapters on Metabolism; The Dynamic Element of Life; Structure; Cell Life and Cell Multiplication; Genesis, Heredity and Variation; and Recent Criticisms and Hypotheses. The chapter, "The Arguments from Embryology," has been mainly rewritten, and there are a number of smaller additions in the form of new sections incorporated in pre-existing chapters. The additions, mentioned and three new appendices—The General Law of Animal Fertility; The Adequacy of Natural Selection; and The Inheritance of Functionally Wrought Modifications—have increased the size of the volume to 706 pages.

Paleface and Redskin, and Other Stories for Boys and Girls.

By F. ANSTET, author of "Vice Versa," etc. With many illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

The author's delightful humor and his command of unexpected incidents are shown at their best in this most interesting book, which will be read by old and young alike.

Success Against Odds; or, How an American Boy Made His Way.

By WILLIAM O. STODDARD, author of "The Battle of New York," "Chris, the Model Maker," "Little Smokey," "Crowded Out of Croftland," "On the Old Frontier," etc. The Last Raid of the Iroquois," etc. Illustrated by B. West Cline. 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

In this spirited and interesting story Mr. Stoddard tells the adventures of a plucky boy who fought his own battles and made his way upward from poverty in a long island seashore town. It is a tale of pluck and self-reliance capitally told. The seashore life is vividly described, and there are plenty of exciting incidents.

These books are for sale by all bookstores; or they will be sent by mail on receipt of price by the publishers.

A Remarkable Book UP TO DATE NOVELS.

THE STORY OF GÖSTA BERLING

From the Swedish of SELMA LAGERLÖF by PAULINE BANCROFT FLACH, 12mo, cloth. Extra, $1.75.

The Bookman There is hardly a page that does not glow with strange beauty, so that the book exerts an unbroken charm from beginning to end.

New York Times This Winter should see Frederika Bremer's triumph repeated by Miss Lagerlöf, for the book has extraordinary charm.

Springfield Republican No bare synopsis can give any notion of this singular book, so full of atmosphere, so crowded with folk-lore. It is a brilliant specimen of the literature of fantasy.

Caroline H. Dell in the Cambridge Tribune Not since the publication of "Wuthering Heights" has the English public been invited to a story like this. In translator and author, a fresh and unexpected revelation of power.

Detroit News Tribune It is impossible to give an idea of the weirdness and charm of the book; this can only be obtained in reading.

Boston Transcript Something of that spirit we find in these wonderful tales which Morris, with his delightful art, has imitated in his medieval stories.

Time and the Hour Something Homeric in its epic simplicity runs through the history of the deposed priest. The opening chapters engage the attention at once by their mystic realism.

HARPER & BROTHERS HAVE JUST PUBLISHED
THROUGH
ASIA By SVEN HEDIN

DR. SVEN HEDIN

With Two Maps and Two Plates Printed in Colors, and about 280 Illustrations by the Author and from Photographs. About 1300 pages. Two Volumes. Large 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, $10.00.

Dr. Sven Hedin's account of his extraordinary journey across the continent of Asia is one of the most thrilling narratives of endeavor, in the face of wellnigh overwhelming odds, which has ever been written. It opens to the reading public the portals of a new world. It is the account of what, with the sole exception of Nansen's attainment of "farthest north," was

THE MOST EXTRAORDINARY
JOURNEY OF THE CENTURY

It is impossible to give an adequate idea of the richness of the contents of this book, nor of its abounding attractions as a story of travel, unsurpassed in geographical and human interest. Altogether the work is one which in solidity, novelty, and interest must take a first rank among publications of its class.—Times, London.

The book is written in a masterly way.—Literature, London and New York.

In these magnificent volumes we have the most important contribution to Central Asian geography made for many years.—Spectator, London.

The whole story of the desert adventure—which occupies the last 200 pages of the first volume—is worthy to be added to the classics in its kind. Nothing more vivid or intensely thrilling has been published for several years.—World, London.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers
NEW YORK AND LONDONHERBERT S. STONE & CO.'S ANNOUNCEMENT.
By HAROLD FREDERIC.

GLORIA MUNDI.

Harold Frederic's masterpiece. The reading of "Gloria Mundi" brings with it an almost insurmountable melancholy. It is so good a book, so far above the average fiction of the day, that one is aggrieved at the thought of the author's having been carried away before his maturity had come. Some men outlive their greatness; others never fully reach it, and Harold Frederic was assuredly one of the latter class.—Chicago Times-Herald.

GLORIA MUNDI.

One of his finest works. Full of force, originality and interest. Movement and dialogue exceptional. It is harder than ever to relinquish Harold Frederic when such a book as "Gloria Mundi" reveals to us the possibilities of his genius.—Chicago Times-Herald.

GLORIA MUNDI.

Admirable the work is in many a passage of humor and tenderness; triumphant in many a stroke of technique. Though the man who wrote it could hit from the shoulder at everything conceited or pharisaical, he preserved the impersonality of the artist in a theme bristling with current ideas.—The Academy.

GLORIA MUNDI.

It is packed with interesting thought, as well as clear-cut individual and living character, and is certainly one of the few striking serious novels, apart from adventure and romance which have been produced this year.—St. James's Gazette.
